CONT
1967

We remember things like when Caesar died for a while
Sometimes we forget and flunk the test.
The things we remember best aren't usually facts or even names.
Perhaps the way a friend spoke
When reading a favorite poem
Or ran to the window when snow began to fall.
The broken tune the band or choir was humming after the concert,
That might last.
The time a classmate's head was burrowed in his arm
When he was tired of necessary things
And the flustered teacher spread her arms like wings
And woke us all with one idea—
I forget what.
But those ideas, those pictures and sounds will grow more real
When away from the source, we someday hear a voice,
See a bird fly that brings back the poetry of it all—
The closeness of the system of bells and classes
And climbing stairs with books nudging at our backs.
When crossing a field somewhere
A bunch of flowers burst blue

—Dale Mathews

NOEL

He had disappeared one December night
Down the street
To buy a Christmas tree.
A great tall green one, he said
And showed how big with his hands
And all the children shouted,
Planned popcorn and cranberry strings.
Then he just went out and
Never came home.
They went out with lanterns of course
And later they cried.
But the children went next door and Stole the neighbor's tree and Put a naked angel on the top.

—David Walker

A little girl,
And skinny
—I remember—
But sturdy,
shod in leather,
With tight hair braided down
To plaid pleated skirts
And thick woolen stockings
That flashed along the corridors
In chase of the sunbeams
Skipping away
Ahead of her eyes.
A little girl,
And skinny
—Now—
With breast unbuttoned,
Ribbons dripping
From hair
That straggles down
And brushes lips
That hang apart
As toes are curling in the firelight
And eyes are gaping,
Hard and still,
In the whisperless night.

THE MULLION

The queen reigns in golden diamonds
In a land of castles and seagulls
With the grace of beauty and art,
And loves to walk through pigeoned parks
And touch the slate and grasses between,
Stepping slowly and watching the sky of Spring;

Everyone needs a queen.

The pauper reigns in a garden plot
In a countryside of sunshine and harvest
With the grace of autumn and the fertile seed,
And loves to stroll a leaf-strewn lane
And touch the leaves blowing there free,
Stepping briskly and watching where his next step will fall;

Everyone needs a pauper.

But everyone is going I know not where,
In a world of summer and winter,
With a soul of ice and fire,
And nothing to thaw or extinguish it,
Senses honed dull,
Sleeping;

Do queens and paupers need everyone?

— Steve Preiss

ONE LITTLE GIRL

She clawed as if trying to fly underwater, moving her slender arms faster, racing death to tread upwards towards the light. The tiled bottom of the swimming pool ran in wavy black lines, distorting more as she felt the pressure of water rush up through her arms. The fuzzy blackness in her mind obscured her vision. Pain in her lungs cut knife-like, sharp and twisting. But she drew her arms to her sides, pinning them there as if with weighted metal chains, to slow her ascent. It was then she began to count objects in her mind, compensating for the emptiness in her lungs.

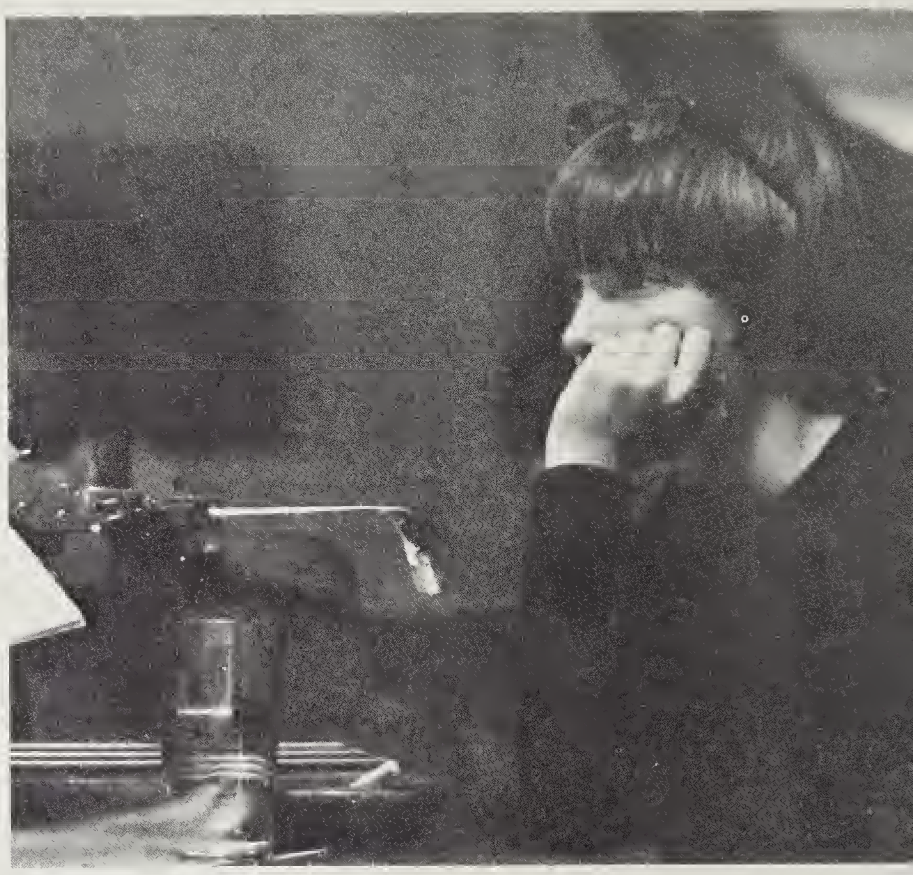
Moving noises like the squiggly lines on the bottom of the pool broke her reverie. The chlorine burned in her eyes. Groping, her hand touched the ledge. She pulled herself to the side of the pool by her handhold and felt her ear break the meniscus of the water. The feeling that her head was stuffed with cotton wads popped in her ears. The voices came again:

"Phoebe! Phoebe! Now quit that. Don't ever do it again. What are you trying to do, anyway?"

Phoebe leaned back, caught her hair in the water, did not answer. Two knees like pink gourds were pressed against the pool floor and crouched behind them, on hands and knees, peering through spectacles, was Allison.

"I can hardly breathe myself when you stay down so awfully long. It's almost like you didn't want me to breathe either. Now quit staying down on the bottom of the pool," said Allison. Her spectacles were misted. Short black hair hugged her face like an inverted bowl. Her dark eyes squinted as she peered upward to the overhead light fixtures to read the wall clock.

"Come on out, anyway. It's time to go. Everybody else has already gone home. And besides, you're not practicing now. You haven't done any laps in the last half hour. You're just goofing off. It's time to go home for lunch, Phoebe." Allison sat down on the floor and took off her spectacles and polished them clean on her blouse. Phoebe closed her eyes, holding on to the ledge with one hand, and caught her hair in the water again and let her ears pop. She sensed the reflection of lights playing over the water in her mind's eye.



Carolyn Vaughan

"I don't want to come out yet," she called. Phoebe pushed off with her feet from the pool, swimming on her back out to the deep end.

Allison adjusted her glasses. "You have to," she said. "It's time to go."

Phoebe pushed her face back in the water, sucking up water through her teeth and rolling on her back. She squirted it out like a whale.

"I waited all morning for you to finish team practice."

Phoebe squirted again.

"I waited all morning. Aren't you ready to go yet? You're not practicing. Come on," pleaded Allison, unbending from her position at the side of the pool. She smoothed her hand over her shorts, straightening out the creases. "Come on out," she said.

Phoebe looked at her. "I think I'm going to swim laps now. I have to practice some more," she called, still squirting water like a whale in the deep end of the pool.

Sunlight flashed on Allison's spectacles from one of the high windows sunken in the wall. Phoebe started swimming towards the shallow end. Allison left and closed the door behind.

Phoebe stopped swimming and climbed out of the pool. In the dressing room her teeth chattered. She stuck the lump of towel in her teeth and looked in the mirror over her dressing bench. Phoebe was a tall girl for fourteen with narrow shoulders and long dark brown hair. She parted it in the middle and let it touch her shoulders when she tilted her head back to see if it were growing any longer. Her green eyes deepened in sunlight as she combed her hair in the dressing room. She sat down and dried herself and squeezed a lump of her hair in the towel to help it dry faster. The empty locker room trailed a film of water with islands of dry cement jutting out. The window at the far end of the locker room with the metal guard railing around it emitted a breeze which pulled and pushed at the white window curtain like a bellows sucking at the air it releases. The sunlight streaked through the green quartz-like windowpanes. It gleamed on the coil of radiators lining the side of the bench. Through the foliage of a magnolia outside with its petaled blossoms reaching up to the window, a yellow light winked on and off. The warm smell of chlorine sank heavier into the room with the breeze. It burned again in her eyes as she remembered it in the bottom of the pool.

The marble bench in front of the campus library was vacant. Phoebe sat down and parked her red striped swimming bag between her feet and watched the yellow light blinking at the crosswalk outside of the library entrance. The campus bus trudged around the quadrangle and stopped at the crosswalk. The black exhaust leaked out from its tailpipe and trailed behind, clouding the afternoon mood with its film. Fumes and gases distorted the stone building beyond like a sheet of faulty glass. The bus gunned its motor, lurched off, edged around the last corner more slowly, easing the front of the bus around and then pulling the end after it like an inchworm.

Phoebe became aware of the sensation that she was being watched. "What are you doing way over here?" called a voice behind her. Phoebe turned. The girl wore her hair in bangs across her forehead and a clean white part was running down the center of her black hair, cut short like an inverted bowl. Her shorts were wrinkled.

"I thought you were going home for lunch, Allison," said Phoebe, reaching down for the drawstring on her swimming bag, tugging hard at it.

"I was." Allison sat down on the bench. "Aren't you hungry yet?" she asked.

"I thought I'd wait a while first," replied Phoebe, not looking directly at Allison, but over her shoulder in the direction of the blinker light. "Shade feels good, huh," she offered.

Allison stared at her. "I know why you're waiting," she said. "You're waiting for her, aren't you? You're waiting for Miss Brooks."

Phoebe tightened the string on her swimming bag and dropped it down between her feet. "So what? It's not your bench, you know. I can sit here all I like."

"Is that why you come home late everyday from swimming practice? Is it?" quizzed Allison.

Phoebe sat up straighter on the bench. She tilted her head so that her long brown hair touched on the back of her neck. She looked away.

"I'm only trying to help, Phoebe. I knew you were coming to see her. You didn't have to say. It's your green eyes. I can read in them what you never will tell me." Allison lowered her face so that Phoebe could not see. Phoebe frowned.

"I don't want your old help," said Phoebe, still frowning.

"Well, maybe so, but that isn't what the girls at school say. They think you're a terrible snob."

"I am."

"You just think you are. You like to pretend that. But really, you ignore us all. At school you wanted to be with Miss Brooks more than us. It gets to them . . . they talk about it to me all the time." Allison's eyes seemed darker to Phoebe than before.

"Is that all?" Phoebe stirred in her position on the bench beside Allison. She could feel her hair sticking to her blouse in a wet place on her back.

"They . . ." Allison looked at Phoebe with the intent stare that made Phoebe feel as she used to at night when she was undressing for bed. She thought that people were staring at her body. "Oh nothing," finished Allison. "It was nothing, really."

"Well what? I don't care what they said. You can tell me." Phoebe stared at her hands.

Allison lifted her eyes. "They say you're in love with Miss Brooks and they wanted to know what it was like having you for a best friend."

"And you told them that I loved everything that moved," interrupted Phoebe.

Allison took off her glasses and polished them clean. "I didn't. I said you didn't confide in me anymore and that you never bothered with anybody anymore."

Phoebe looked away.

"Well, you don't," said Allison, watching her.

Phoebe moved, reached down and picked up a blade of grass and split it with her thumbnail while Allison said nothing and did not watch.

"I waited for you. I went to the library to return those books and saw you over here," Allison started again.

Phoebe bent the blade of grass double.

Allison whispered: "I saw Miss Brooks in the library. She asked about you."

Phoebe looked up, interested. "She did? What did she say?"

"Oh, I don't know." Allison leaned back on the bench and Phoebe watched her out of the tail of her eye, waited.

"She said she wanted to see you about something. That was all." Allison shrugged her shoulders. "Does she study in there?" she asked, pointing behind herself to the library.

"She spends all her time in there," answered Phoebe. Phoebe, too looked towards the library and the magnolia trees shading the entrance to it. Phoebe regarded Allison meditatively, as if seeing her for the first time. "She might not teach another year." Allison's part was crooked. The breeze wisped her short black hair around her face. "You never had her, did you?" asked Phoebe quietly.

"No, I never did."

"She might not teach another year." Phoebe raised her hand and pretended to sketch the outline of a faraway building. "I said that though, didn't I?" Phoebe stared at her hands. She frowned as if remembering something unpleasant.

"Phoebe," began Allison.

"No." Phoebe dropped her hands to her lap. "I wouldn't say anything about next year. I would just watch her a moment. I could do that." She looked over Allison's shoulder towards the blinker light. "Do you think she could see me sitting way over here?"

Phoebe sensed something elipsing the sun. The shadow lengthened. Allison was standing over her. "Phoebe, I wouldn't see her if I were you," said Allison, watching her. "It's for your own good."

"Allison! You just don't understand." But Phoebe sat on the bench, watching the shadow on the grass. "Sometimes," she, said, "I imagine she comes out to talk and I think of all the things we might say. When I go home I have a fear of never seeing her again."

"That's silly. You can see her at school on Monday."

"That's just it. I'm afraid my parents won't let me keep on going to school where I wish. They'll send me away to school."

"But your grades are fine," insisted Allison.

"Just the same, I have that fear. I had it once when my Irish Setter ran away from home one day in the summer and I just knew he'd never come back. It was because I loved him so much." Phoebe felt Allison's shadow move. She watched the grass again. "I found him one day. A car had run over him. He was just lying there, by the side of the road with dried mud caked in his paws, and his mouth. And blueflies were buzzing around his head and in his ears. I never wanted another dog." She looked up at Allison. "It just wouldn't be the same."

"But you just can't give up," coaxed Allison, taking the towel she had brought with her from its place on the bench to her arms. "You're not being fair to yourself, Phoebe. Try to be fair to yourself."

"What about the others? All I do is waste her time. That's fairness, is it?" Phoebe looked up again, expectantly. Allison was not smiling.

"That's not what I said. You have to decide if you're going to go on seeing her or not. And then don't worry about the others. They can take care of themselves."

Phoebe stared at her hands, turned them over, inspected them. "Do you think it's all right? Being so fond of a teacher and all?"

"I said not to worry about the others."

"I don't mean the others," interrupted Phoebe standing up. "I mean you, Allison. Do you think it's fair?"

Phoebe stood up even with her. Sunlight flashed on Allison's spectacles. Allison turned her face from the sun. Phoebe could not see her face.

"If you want . . . I have other friends. If you want a teacher for one of yours, I'll stand behind you. You're fortunate, you know, having a teacher for a friend." Allison turned into the glare of the sun, spectacles flashing. She smiled. "I envy you sometimes."

Phoebe said nothing. Allison smiled again. "I'm going home for lunch; call me if you want to."

Phoebe nodded and watched her disappear down the quadrangle to the road that led back to their neighborhood. She picked up the swimming bag from the ground and uncrumpled it. The sun moved from behind a cloud. She watched the library entrance with shaded eyes and hoisted the bag to her shoulders and stood.

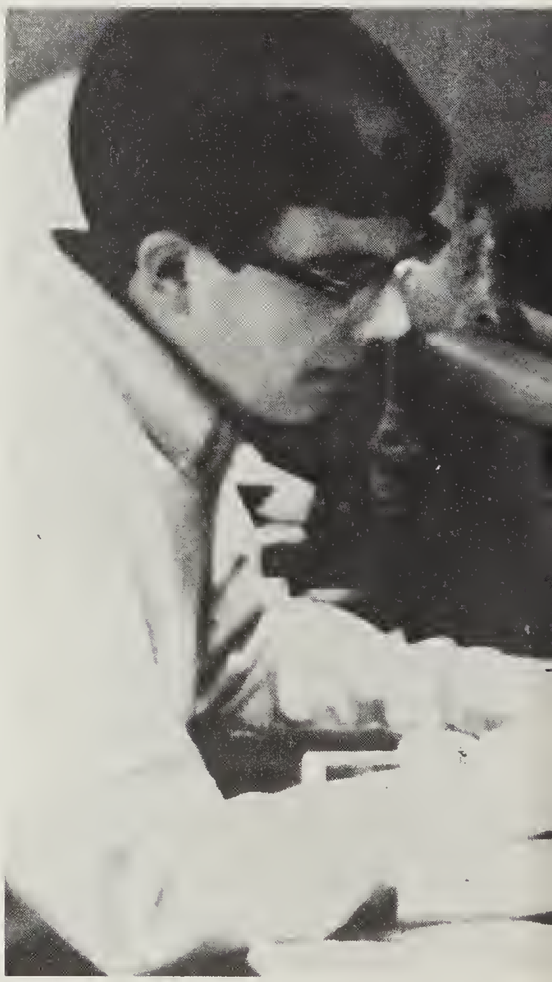
The breeze stiffened and the magnolia trees, clumped around the entrance to the library, parted their foliage like a child searching in the grass for Easter eggs. The lawn had been freshly mowed and had a cleaner look about it than when she had come to swimming practice early that morning. Phoebe wanted to take her shoes off and go running barefoot through it. She kicked off one shoe and stood balanced on the pavement. She slipped her foot out of the other one.

A woman appeared from the arched entrance under the magnolia trees and walked towards the blinker light and the bench beside the bus stop.

Phoebe had grass in her shoe. She saw the teacher sitting alone on the marble bench under the yellow light winking. She was wearing the green dress.

Then Phoebe stuck her shoes back on with the grass still in them and started walking back down the hill after Allison.

And she was counting objects and things in her mind.



OH MY AMERICA

by Clinton Pyne

Oh my America the beautiful.
from sea to shining sea, I see
John F. Whatshisname Memorial Spitoons; and polyvinyl plastic crusifix pillows
(Souvenir of Niagara Falls.)
You are the home of the Free and
The land of the Brave.
From Grenada, Mississippi to Harlem.
So here I sit in my split-level school
With its new football helments.
And write about it.

Hello little brownmouse living, existing,
In a broken rock wall,
Scurrying here, there, noplace
Aimless intention on being something else.
Fool! You will always be
A little brownmouse,
for ever and ever, anyway,
You wouldn't like it here,
Here, in the autumn world
Of human reality
Of twisted emotions
That make no sense.
Maybe one day
You and I can trade places.
At least for a little while.

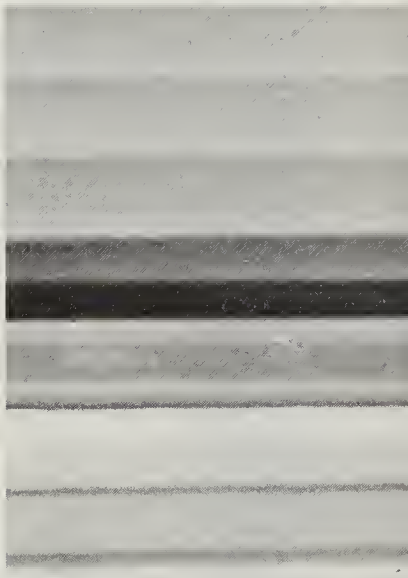
Standing in knee-highwaves
Gathering the senses to a single unit;
Walking a nettled catwalk
To be tuned to the clamorous
and the hushing sounds of life;
Remaining to quietly view
The protruding, glazed, and happy eyeball;
Smelling bread, fires, perfume, and rubbish
Mixed to an inseparable blend;
The delicate but disciplined fingers of a woman
And the hot breath of the city
That burns itself into the tongue
And threatens with its grip
Until . . . before the blurred eyes
Everything sweeps into Awe. . .
And Fear.

—David Rigsbee

GATHERING INDIAN RELICS

Early morning,
I walk the furrows
Seeking vestiges of cruder lives than mine,
Tools of chisled flint, fragmented earthenware
Interred by wind and rain,
Unearthed by plow.
Back and forth I tread the field,
Head bowed,
Often stooping to crumble soil
Off an artifact, or more likely
Just a stone.
Now and then
I raise my head
To survey the contours of the land,
And seeing it as something other than a cornfield
I pause.
Noon,
I walk the furrows still.
The farmer's harvest is not yet planted;
I reap one seeded long ago.

— David Fein



He'd wakened chilled beyond the point
That any heavy clothes could warm,
And yet unwilling to hunt the wood
To build a fire, and cook some food.
He could not guess what early hour
The cold, (and God knows what), had chosen,
To shake him from unsoothing rest.
Nor how much longer he'd have until
The skies, their fourth day clouded then,
Would loose themselves with snow or rain.

The ashes from the last night's fire
Were blown and scattered by the wind
That started as he'd tried to sleep,
And gone on through his shameful dreams.
It even now could force itself
Upon his fire and in his bed.
He'd have to eat his breakfast cold,
And then he'd leave, though ill prepared.

—Ronnie Clark

His hand brown
And my hand white
Touched in the sad darkness
That hid all else.
And in that sad darkness
His voice was not brown,
Nor white,
But just his voice.
And yet his words
Instilled a fear.
He spoke of things
I did not understand
And did not want to hear.
I cried,
    Don't say such things.
He smiled,
    If I don't, others will.
    I must.
And like the rain
That made beaded patterns
On the dusty window pane,
Like frosted glass
In public places,
His words came
And went away.

—Sarah Vincent

—Shirley Watkins

THE DISCUSSION

The words whirl
As the room spins
Centrifuging thoughts
Against the day
When life no longer coaxes.
Youth
In luxurious bicker.
They defend their thoughts
Attacking with war-plans
Subtly clear,
Playing their game.

BUTTERFLY

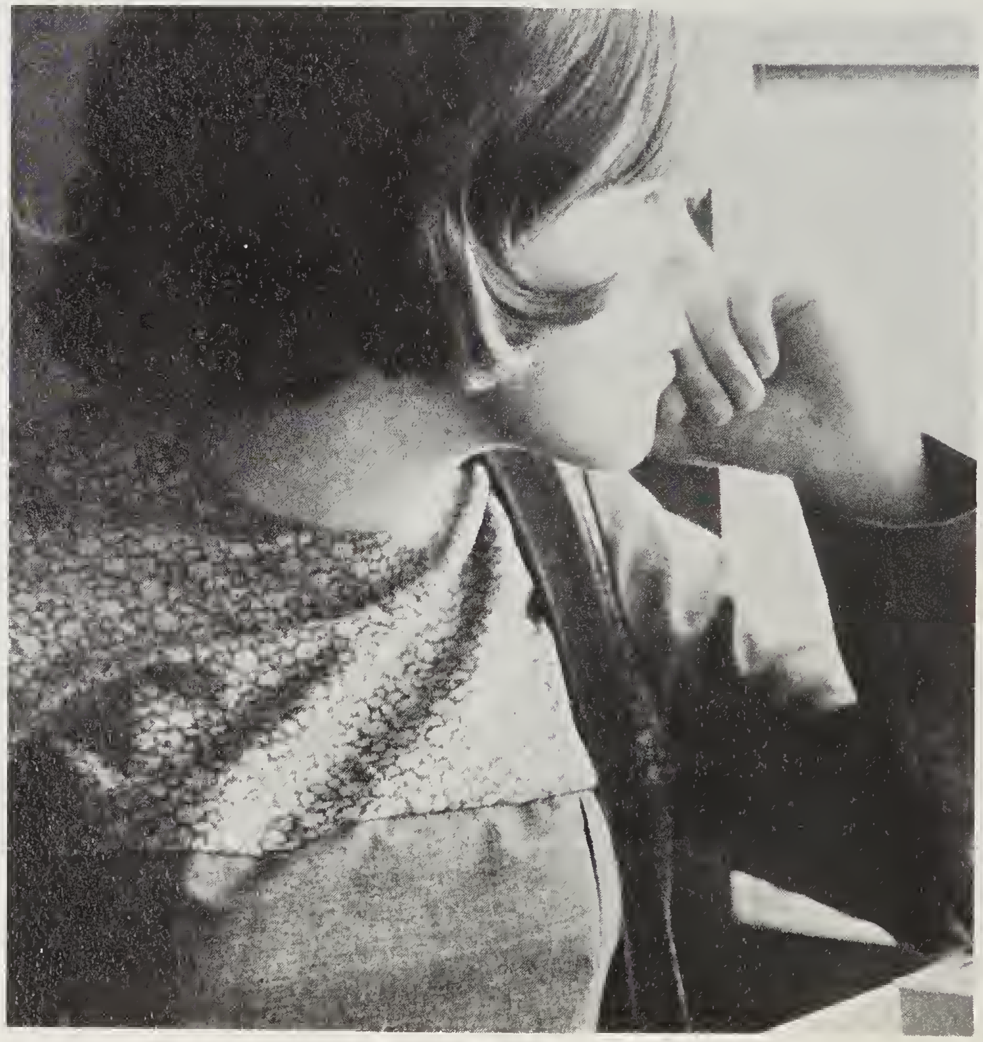
The heavy drops of rain
Fall from the grey, sullen sky;
They beat down upon the parched earth
    with an angry pounding.
In a puddle of stagnant water
A dead butterfly floats with wings outstretched.

— Charlotte McLamb

My Sailboat

Jane Alexander

I went for a walk the other day and I passed by a little boy playing in a gutter. His blue and white striped shirt was torn at the right sleeve, and his small blue blue jeans were faded and dirty. But he wore a smile, for he possessed a shiny sailboat. I watched him as he became more and more excited with each new ripple that the tiny boat engraved in the water. He was so engrossed with his best friend, which held so much importance to him, that he did not even notice me standing there watching. I started to approach him and a look of fear appeared on his face. I asked him about his beautiful sailboat and the big smile came back, displaying his untreated teeth. Other children passed by and laughed at my newly-found friend. Tears began to well in his eyes and I tried to explain to him that they were just jealous. I think he understood me. I have gotten to know and love this little boy and I go to see him everyday, while he plays with his little boat; and each day he tells me something different that he has learned. I wish that I could shelter him from all the bad in the world, and I pray that he will never change, for you see, he is my sailboat.



THE HILL

Beth Robertson

It was late in the afternoon when he stepped out into the path. He heard the familiar sound of the key grating in the lock as he walked away from the building. He didn't look back, though. He would never look back.

It was cold now. He drew his jacket up close to his neck to keep out the bitter wind. Slushy, grey snow was on the ground, trampled by thousands of footprints. Fragile icicles clung to the pine trees, each one sending tiny tear-like drops to the ground. All was silent except for an occasional crackle of a branch, as it yielded to the force of the snow that weighed it down.

He had reached the hill now. Far below him he could see the city. The miniature cars were moving hurriedly back and forth. He could imagine what it was like. He could imagine the honking of horns, the rough, angry voices, and the policeman's shrill whistle. He could close his eyes and see it all before him. He stopped walking. He lingered at the hill for a few minutes.

He put his ragged duffle bag down on the ground, and leaned against the tree. He reached for his cigarettes. The package had been crushed hours before, and now only one was left. He took out his matches, and struck one against the worn surface of the matchbox. After two strikes, it burst into a bright yellow flame. He brought the flame up to the cigarette. Long and slender wisps of smoke twisted about before him. He watched them intently for a few minutes, and then drew in a mouthful of smoke. He sighed with deep satisfaction, as he exhaled. He looked at the half-burned cigarette that he held, and then threw it on the ground. The doctors had told him not to smoke. With a mingled feeling of disgust and sorrow, he crushed it with his foot.

There were cigarette butts strewn all over the concrete floor of the subway. Many people were walking about, and some were standing walking about, and some were waiting. He walked towards his train. People were staring at him. He tried to ignore their cold, haughty glances, but finally he could not. Why were they staring at him? Perhaps his shirt-tail was out. No, it wasn't. Why, then? Why were they all giving him such queer looks? What was wrong? Maybe they even thought he was the convict who had escaped last week. Yes, that must be it. He musn't run; he must act normal. He quickened his walking pace as his heart beat faster and faster. Then he saw the policeman. He must get away quickly. He ran to the train and got in. He pushed his way through the crowd of people in the car. and squeezed into a corner. Surely they couldn't see him. But, wait, they could. That lady was talking about him. He could tell by the way she looked at him. She must know. She'll tell the conductor. The train screeched to a halt, as it came to its third stop. He got out of the car, and ran up the subway steps. Soon they would be after him. He darted across the busy street, barely missing being hit by a truck. The truck driver must know. He must have been trying to kill him. He escaped into a sidestreet. The silence was overwhelming. No-one was there. He relaxed; far ahead of him he could see the tree. They were evil and menacing. Then he realized that he was being trapped. The street was an alley. The long finger-like branches of the trees were beckoning him forward. He stopped. What could he do? He couldn't go back and he couldn't go forward. All of a sudden he found himself crying and screaming. People came from nowhere. His screams grew louder. The people were talking to him softly. Men were holding him firmly. They were taking him, they were taking him away . . .

He shuddered as a cold drop of water dripped down his back. He musn't think about it any more. It was all over now. He picked up the duffle bag and walked down the road. The rusty, iron gate stood before him. He pulled the gate, and it opened reluctantly with a whine. He walked out, and clanged the gate behind him. For a second he glanced at the battered sign; McLean Hospital for the Emotionally Disturbed. Then he turned away and walked down to the city.

THE COURT-JESTER

The court-jester on guard,
Wearily watching
For the Sign of the Times,
Is condemned to wait.
Restless, his stance,
The Neons are calling.
He travels easiest
In the lanes of the night,
He understands the Shadows
And calls them "Friends,"
The gutters are flooding,
For it's always just rained,
The ragged clown and Jesus,
The court musician and Judas
Are all on drugs
And feeling very psychic.
The segregated wind sees it
And whispers that perhaps,
But the jester will not listen.
He is afraid of Secrets.
Inert, he waits for his own Maybe.
"The eleventh hour, and all is well."
Intercourse, the malevolent,
Walks the streets.
Disturb the peace!

The night is crying for an end.
The jester, too is ready to leave,
He believes in the Ultimate . . .

One lonely, silent tear fell,
And did not stop until it reached
The fartherest corner of the soul,
But the soul knew why it was there,
For the soul felt what the tear could only express.

August Sixth

I cannot leave this place.
The most unhappiest.
Of the heat and yet
The willow tree
To wear my loafers wet
Because they are
And yet I cannot kiss a thing goodby.
Because I have not once been Happy here
And yet have loved the place
For its old patterned brick
And aged pride.
I know not why
But the bamboo here has grown
A little bit.
I cannot leave this place—
And yet
Goodbye.

Homecoming Queen, Janice Holleman

Mood Climaxes As Holleman Is Crowned Queen . . .

Fall Festival spurred school spirited sports fans to recognize senior superiority on Senior Day. The "Storm is Brewing Day" encouraged students to don rain gear in anticipation of the invasion by the Wilson Cyclones. The weather forecast at Rejuvenation prophesied the need of school support for the Homecoming football game against Wilson. Led by head cheerleader, Nancy Roach, the DHS student body, clad in red and white school colors, cheered the team in a pep rally.

Senior class officers, David House, president; Brent Lee, vice-president; Michele Smith, secretary; and Nancy Bagwell, treasurer, hosted the coronation at the half-time of the Wilson-Durham contest. Master of Ceremony, Senior Class President David House, revealed the decision of the Homecoming Court Nomination and crowned Janice Holleman, senior representative, the 1966-67 Homecoming Court Queen.

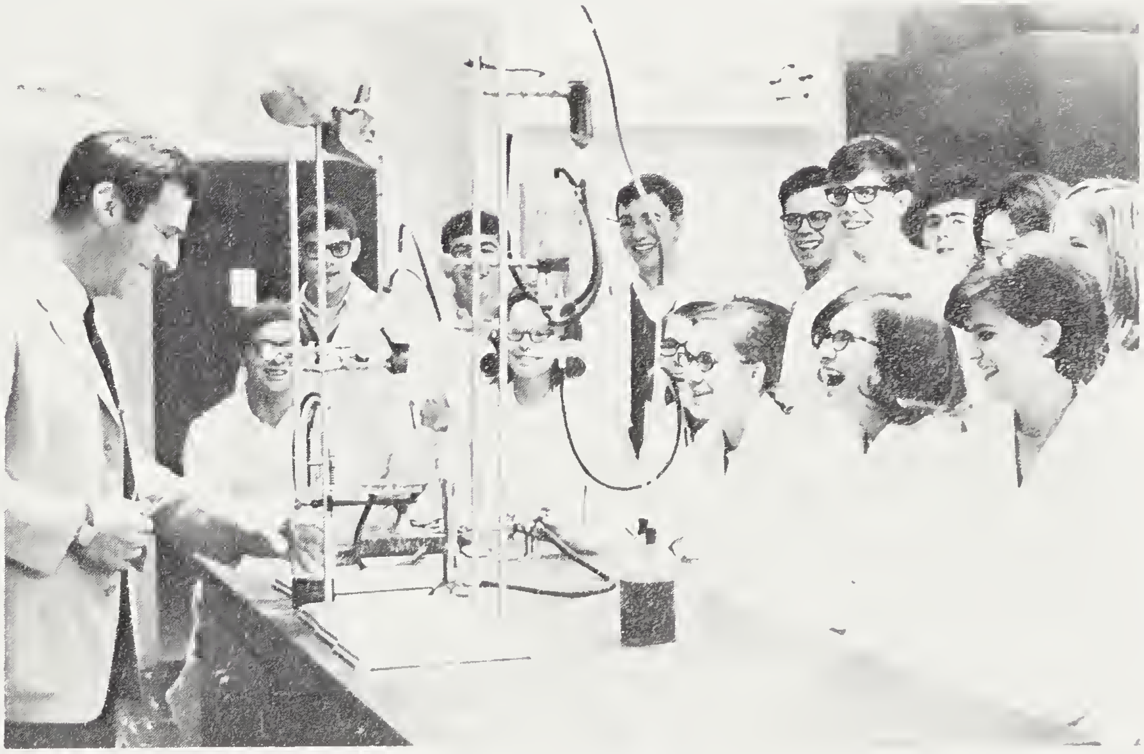
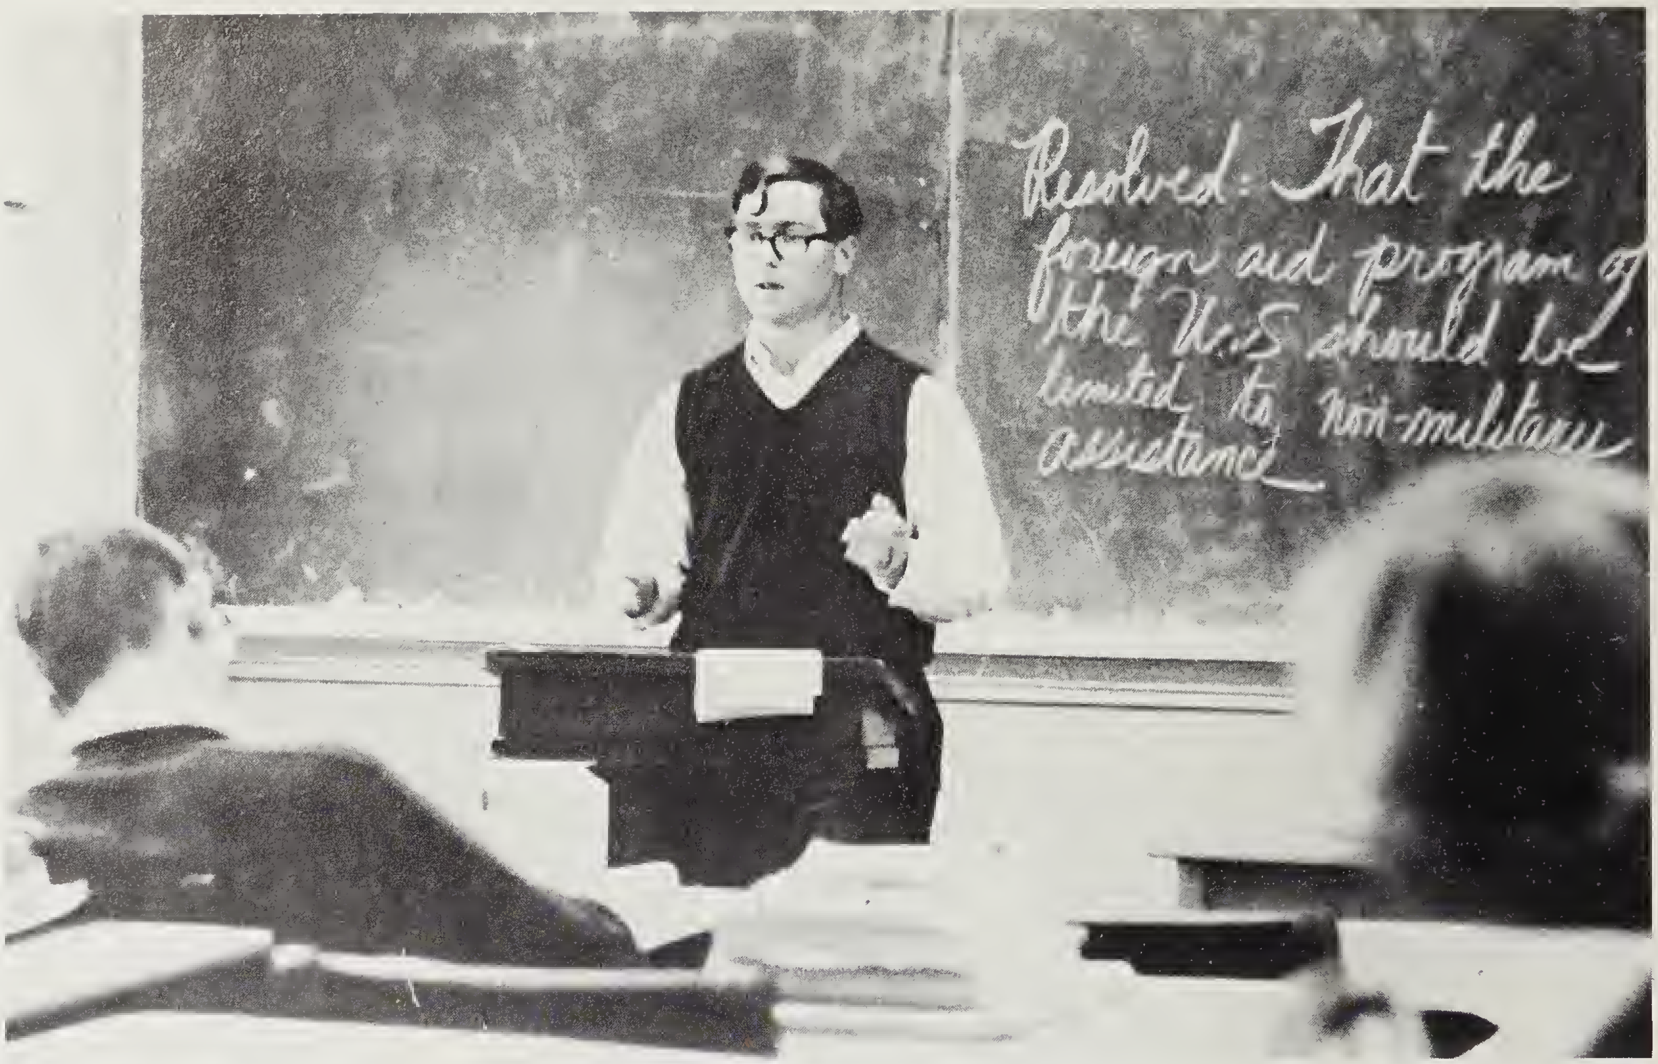
Engineers, Chemists, Acquire Technical Knowledge . . .

The opportunities in the field of engineering are accentuated by the activities of the Engineers Club. The members are invited to a banquet each year which is sponsored by the Durham Engineers Club. A visit to the Engineer's Fair at the University of North Carolina State at Raleigh, and to Wrights Machinery acquaint these boys with the world of engineering. The engineers are: L. J. Copley, President; Johnny Shepherd, Vice-Pres.; Donald J. Morgan, Sec.-Treas.; Howard Rogers, Don Garrard, James Upchurch, Canley Hilliard, Jim Hamlin, Robert Gooch, Ronnie Bradshaw, Danny Best, Frank Baker, Jim Taylor, Nicky Knickerbacker, Steve Clark, Arthur Gordon, Scotty Lyons, Tommy Roberts, Archie Smith, Len Riley, Wesley Loftis, Mike Willis, Ike Teer, Wade Kerr, Robert Young, Bruce Knott, John Elkins, Randy Embree, Tommy Beard, Doug Griffin, David Rich, Chuck Clemens, Milton Harper, Tommy Cranford, Steve Laws, Tommy Mays, and Jerry Johnson.

Explore Shared Interests

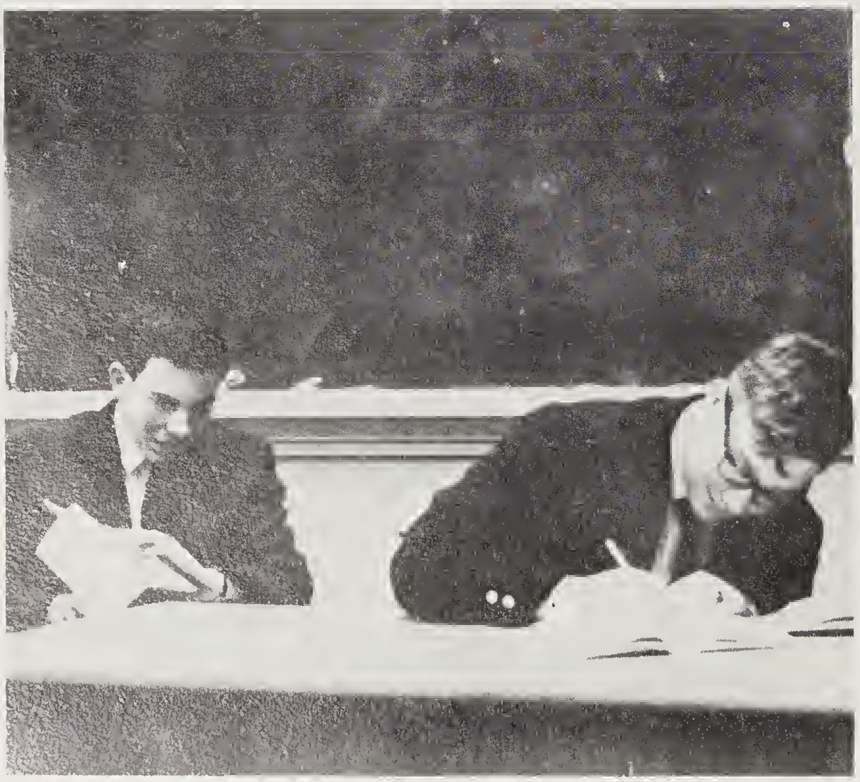
At 7:45 a.m. Chem II students assemble in S201 for two hours of instruction in chemical theory supplemented with practical lab experience. Guided by Mr. John S. Davey, the dashing British teacher on exchange for Mr. Bernard Toon this year, Chem II students respond with enthusiasm to a challenge of individual thought in their field of study. The Chem II students are: Kotherine Bradley, Ronny Clork, Tommy Council, David Fein, Lewis Jockson, Kris Jorgensen, An LoBorre, Richord Losoter, Pom Linder, Jonet Mortell, Laura McDonold, Bob Moore, Chorlie Rolston, Von Singletary, Mike Solomon, Carol Watkins, Steve Wilson, and Chris Woodruff.





Resolved: That the foreign aid program of the U.S. should be limited to non-military assistance

The Art Of Speaking And . . .



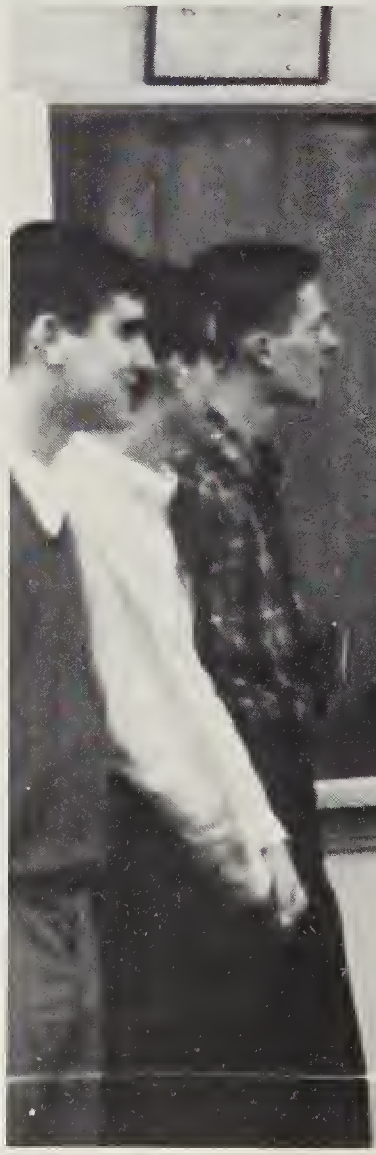
Representing DHS in intra-school debate tournaments throughout the state, is the Debate Club. Each member is able to enrich his individual art in forensic competition. Active Debate Club members: Peter Baker, Charles Billings, Jim Bryan, Nancy Coble, Doug Davidson, Allan Dworsky, Mike Kaufman, Patty McDonald, Richard Miller, Bob Moore, Gregory Pocopio, Clinton Pyne, Susan Rogers, Louis Swanson, Pres.; Ken Watkins, Carolyn Wetherby, Scott Wilkinson, Gayle Yocum, and Mrs. Laurie Buehler, Advisor.

Writing Strengthens Student's Ability

To Express And Defend Ideas

Mount Parnasus was the home of the Greek gods of the Arts and has become the goal for which the newest club at D. H. S., the Parnassians, strives. In order to further their talents in reading and writing, the members criticize and discuss their own poetry. A UNC graduate student also spoke on a few of the greater authors. The Parnassians: Bill Watson and Jon Harris, Co-Pres.; David Walker, V. Pres.; Ruth Evans, Sec.; Alex Tanford, Treas.; Larry Alford, Cathy Bell, Jim Berry, Mike Blalock, Lucy Crockett, Deborah Gary, Betsy Lindsay, Edwin Murray, Keith Upchurch, David Wilson, Blackwell Brogden, Phyllis Jones, Beth Robertson, Sarah Vincent, and Mrs. Louise Edwards, Advisor.

Students Adapt Mathematical Principles



Mathematics is a part of everyday living to the members of the Math Club. This is exemplified by the decorating of a Geometree at Christmas, the lecturing of a Duke professor on college freshman math and the touring of the computer center at the Research Triangle. Math Club members: David Atkins, Jerry Branch, Tom Donegan, Carole Eisenberg, Deborah Gary, Arthur Gordan, Sandy Gordan, Lisa Grabarek, Theresa Greenberg, Pete Greenspan, Robert Gooch, Pres.; Linda Griffith, Bobby Hersh, Lee Hollingsworth, Diana Jones, Bill Leathers, Claude Lambe, Randy Means, Chap.; Beverly McCraw, Carolyn Mold, Bob Moore, Randy Peacock, Jane Pickard, Sec.; Donna Rigsbee, Mike Solomon, Carol Anne Sorrell, Duane Southerland, Bob Strawbridge, Ken Underwood, Tom Trent, Terry Weisner, Dan Wishnietsky, David Wilson, Carol Watkins, Sec.; Shirley Watkins, Bill Watson, V. Pres.; and Major O'Shea, Advisor.

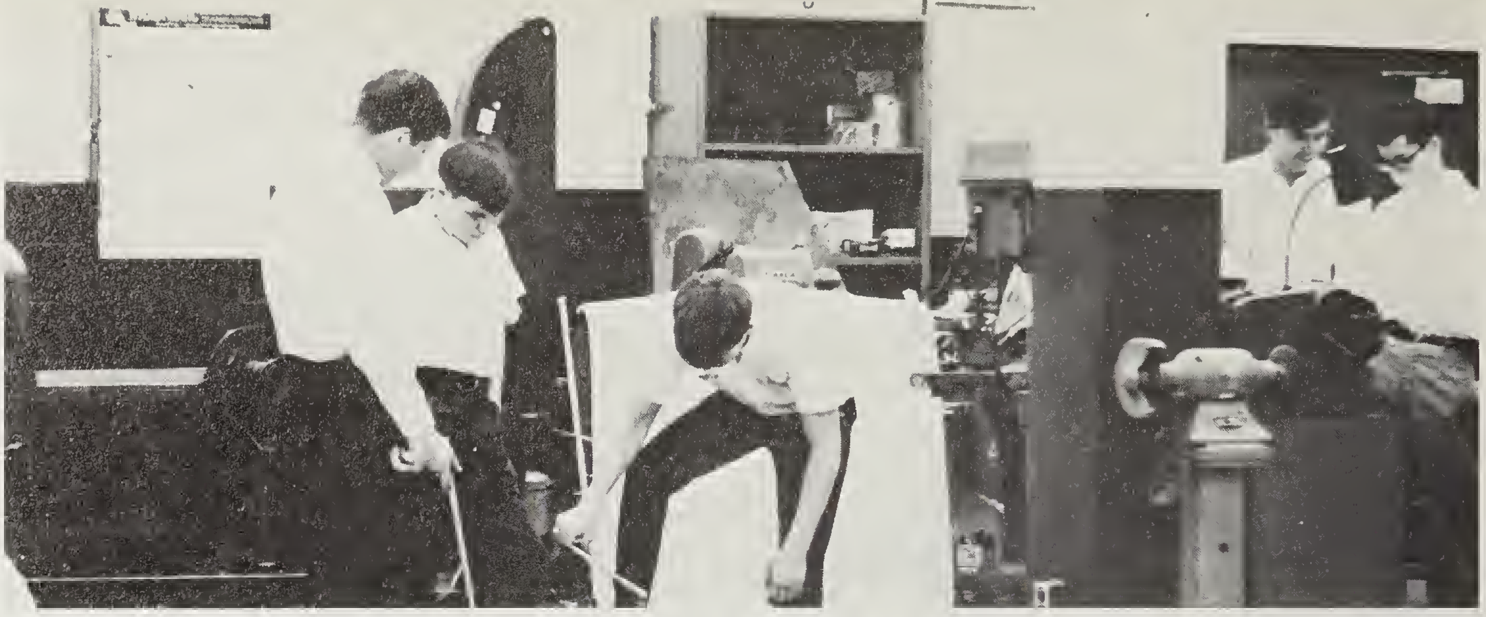
Practical Classroom Instruction . . .

The rebuilding of a machine may seem like an easy task, but to those students enrolled in the Machine Shop class, this is a skill to be developed through instruction. The first year students have a particular project and are supervised by the second year students, who work outside of the classroom. Machine shop students are: Hank Laugee, Pres.; Wayne Neal, V. Pres.; Rickie Jackson, Sec.; William Rich, Treas.; Bryant Inscae, Reporter; William Baltan, Ranald Bradshaw, Bobby Buchanan, William Cates, Thamas Sherran, Williard Brown, Miltan Harper, Ryland Knatt, David Weatherspaan, Harold Wright.



Introduce Vocational Opportunities

The auto mechanic is trained in the various operations and the make-up of the automobile. Problems and malfunctions that could arise are discussed. The students then received first-hand knowledge in solving these automotive problems by working on both shop and live projects.

The morning auto machanics class consists of: Jack Smith, Pres.; David Stephenson, V. Pres.; Jerry Johnson, Sec.; Preston Broadwell, Treas.; Richard Wilkins, Shop Steward; Ronnie Dearing, Jimmy Hathaway, David Ketner, Tommy May, Bill McCormick, Alan Myers, Randy Podger, Bob Parrish, Jimmy Poole, Kelly Whitman, and Irving Whitney.

This is the DHS football field at 7:20 in the morning. In the moonlight there is quiet. The peaceful music of birds come floating across the empty field, and—Wait! There are people running around in the dark out there! What kind of fools would be outside at this hour of—Oh! It's the Marching Band. See how colorful they are: Blue lips, red noses, purple fingers, and green feet. This must be loyalty.

This is the DHS band room at fourth period. The Wind Ensemble is practicing. Hear the intonation. See Mr. Fleming hear the intonation. See Mr. Fleming wince. This must be dedication.

This is the Wind Ensemble going. Where is the Wind Ensemble going? To Raleigh, to Fayetteville, to Bristol, to Greensboro. This must be spirit.

The DHS Band is indeed one of the most loyal, dedicated, and spirited organizations in the school. Moreover, it is known to be one of the finest concert bands in the state. Its members take pride in knowing their mutual excellence, in knowing the satisfaction of superior achievement. Under the capable leadership of Mr. Robert Fleming, the Wind Ensemble has become an organization of which Durham can be extremely proud.

The Why Of Humanity . . .

It has been said that the use of language is one of the prime differences between men and all other forms of life, for with it he is able to communicate beyond the limits of space and time, to structure and codify his experience. The struggle by the individual student to perfect his use of and response to his own language is one of the basic experiences of his high school career.

In the sophomore year, the themes were literary types, with the elements of a short story changing to toga'd scenes of "Friends, Romans and countrymen" as Shakespeare became do-it-yourself. On the junior level, transcendentalism was met and the development of American writing encountered as Huck Finn floated by and Our Town became a permanent locale on the American scene. By senior year, students were ready for the immortal writers in English, with Paradise well Lost, Canterbury too well Taled, and the witches of Macbeth toiling and troubling. The question, "Can you read and write?" became more complicated, and more meaningful.

Many students, undaunted by three years of required English, plunged into the elective courses for both specialization and surprise. Public speakers had to learn to breathe, and then to expend an enormous amount of hot air on vigorous orations and debates. Advanced Composition proved that there are always more ways than one to express an idea, and usually the revised way was best. Academically Talented students explored the esoteric realms of literature, as Journalists learned the hard way about printer's ink and promotion campaigns.

In each, the process continued: idea became image, deadline became expression, and effort became a new personal skill. Hopefully, after the smudged papers, the discussions, and the stream of books of the English classrooms are forgotten,the effect will remain: Man's mind, as broad and deep as his language.

Mrs. Edwards explains the mechanics of layreaders

To Encourage, Guide, Inspire . . .

The parking lot is sparsely populated at 7:30 A.M. but in the basement, an early morning band group is practicing for the state contest. In the teacher's lounge, two mathematics teachers engage in a private seminar on math theory.

Bells commence ringing. Classes begin formally. Learning is already in progress and will continue past the afternoon bell when the halls are conjested with students anxious to get away.

After school a drama teacher directs the crew of an old fashioned melodrama in the auditorium, and a foreign exchange teacher demonstrates the purpose of the corner flag kick to an enthusiastic soccer team. One teacher reviews the mechanics of a layreader theme, while another listens attentively as a student hi-lights his first job interview in distributive education. An art teacher gives advice on design in jewelry making. A counselor discusses future plans with a college-bound senior. Upstairs a librarian researches a reading list for interested students, and a history teacher continues a class debate on civil rights. One teacher inspires a budding poet, another shares an interest in parliamentary procedure with a member of the debate team.

The DHS faculty members are ready to encourage, guide and inspire. They seek to help the student visualize that the same complexities which create the problems, also present the challenge, and the inspiration to motivate the student throughout life. Beyond the facility of analytical and critical thinking, the DHS faculty encourages the student to be productive in his imagination, and at the highest level, to originate ideas.

The circle of creation starts when the students seek inspiration of a leading force, an example, a teacher. The circle shows work beginning . . . the first struggle with an idea and the attempt to put it on paper, or on canvas, or on a stage. Elation is there as the work advances: acceptance as complete as the rejection. There is the finished work and its audience. The circle of learning begins as youth finds inspiration to reach out for new directions. This book is dedicated to that spirit.

Spoken Word . .

The Language Department continued a diversified program utilizing grammar and literature texts for introductory courses. A supplementary study of historical and cultural correlation through a range of national authors, past and present, developed on the advanced course level. A recent innovation in first year modern language courses is the theory that the students profit most by speaking the language. Records and tapes aid students in perfecting speech patterns and accents. Films and slides widen the scope of study in visual expression of facts and ideas.

Latin students become familiar with cases and conjugations while pursuing ancient mythological lore. Further study reveals The Gallic Wars of Carsar, Virgil's Aeneid and The Metamorphoses of Ovid. French classes emphasize grammar and vocabulary with practice in the language lab and in study of Hugo's Les Miserables. French VI investigates the realm of theater with Moliere's Malade Iraginaire. Spanish I and II provide a foundation of vocabulary and grammar, with an initiation to Spanish literary forms in third year, while Spanish IV concentrates on a synthesis of culture and civilization through the development of language and literature. Early works of artistry under study are Cervantes's colorful Don Quixote and Rojas's memorable novel in dialogue, La Celestina. Russian I and II students are introduced to an intensive study of alphabet and grammar with practice in conversation comprehension via tapes and records. German students acquire a feeling of the language as song and literature enliven vocabulary and grammar study. Advanced study encourages individual creativity in the composition of verse or prose while exploring the works of Kafka, Boll, and Mann.

AFS Program Broadens Educational Concepts . . .

On exchange with Mr. Bernard D. Toan this year is Mr. John S. Davey, Chemistry master from the south of England. Besides a British accent, on which the cast of the senior play "My Fair Lady" capitalized, Mr. Davey brought a lively wit to DHS chemistry labs and the soccer field. He remembered a distinct goldfish feeling during the early days of September as people in a seemingly endless stream moved past S201 casting furtive and often embarrassed glances in his direction. "Who was the girl, I wonder, who came in to observe that she had never spoken to an Englishman before — and then left before I'd even had time to ask her name?"

Mr. Davey commented, "I was pleased to find amongst the students I taught some of the most conscientious and hard-working people I have come across. It's good to teach classes with a lively and corporate sense of humor, too — and not many people in second period chemistry class are ever going to forget 'The Affair of the Christmas Spirit'!"

Contrasting the two schools he revealed: "In the field of education there are enormous differences between our two systems. In England we start school a year earlier than you. We adopt a selective procedure in secondary schools (grades 6-12) and specialize in subjects much earlier, usually around grade 10. Most people leave school at the age of 15 or 16, and we still have less than 10% of the total number of students going on to study degree courses in colleges."

Comparing American and British students, Mr. Davey commented, "It must be very hard for the American student to realize just how exceptionally privileged he is in his day to day surroundings. The student has one right — and that is a right which we all share, whether students or teachers, the right to earn privileges."

Mr. Bernard Toan, taking the position of chemistry master at Lewes Country Grammar School for Boys in place of Mr. John S. Davy, noted that one of the greatest differences between the English and American schools is size. The Grammar School has less than 500 pupils in seven age groups (12 to 18) draws from an extensive area. Teachers work right through the classes. "I like the small schools, and I think they have some very definite advantages. "Mr. Toan told a reporter for the Sussex Express and Country Herald. "Young people are susceptible to crowds in which only a few outstanding personalities make their way. American schools are still neighborhood schools in the sense that their pupils are drawn from the immediate district." Mr. Toan found Lewes "absolutely charming," and described the experience as most interesting. "I enjoy teaching young people very much," he said, "and I find the young people eager to learn, very sharp and very willing."

Mr. Bernard Toan

Steve Wilson and Montri at the soccer game

British Exchange teacher, Mr. John Davey, takes a time out for strategy in the Greensboro-Page soccer game.

Mr. Davey reads the part of Colonel Pickering in the Senior Class play, "My Fair Lady".

Kenny Rasberry, International Relations committee chairman, discusses first impressions offered by AFS students, Trish Lang of Germany, Nancy Coble, returnee from the Philippines, and Montri Sriiomsaard of Thailand.

AFS sponsored o luncheon for AFS returnee Noncy Coble, Montri Sriiamsaard of Thailand, ond Nazli Irani of Tehron, Iron, who is an exchonge student for Jordon High School.

The American Field Service is a private organization without religious or political affiliation, dating from 1914. The purpose of its International Scholarships Program is to promote understanding among nations and provide young people with a unique educational experience.

The student exchange program enabled Montri Sriiamsaard of Nakorn Pathom, Thailand to experience the American way of life. "American people are very active and free," he comments. "Everyone is equal. They use their own personal opinion very much. The thing I like best is educational opportunity." In comparison with DHS, Montri found his Thai high school more difficult. "I don't know the real reason, but I think it is because we don't have enough colleges for the senior students. The Ministry of Education and the University must choose only very good students to graduate and attend the University."

In high school Montri studied over fifteen subjects ranging from chemistry and three math courses to Thai language and Buddhism. Thai students study seven periods a day, five days a week, and are enrolled for three terms a year.

Of his homeland Montri says, "Thailand means the land of the free. It has never been the colony of any country in the world. We are always free.

"We have a slow dance but it is very beautiful. We don't have the teenage fast dances. Young people are less active than here because we have the custom that the younger should respect the older, especially the teachers. Students exercise their personal opinion less than here."

Montri noted that the Thai version of football was an international football which Americans call soccer. Thai boxing, he added, was the favorite sport for boys.

Montri finds DHS a very good school. "All the students are friendly. I am very proud of myself that I am a DHS student. If anyone asks me where I come from, I tell him 'I come from Bulldog Country —Durham High School!'"

Nancy Coble, AFS returnee from the Philippines for the 1966 summer observed that "Kids love the 'modern dance craze' and watching U.S. movies and singing groups." Her course study included Philippine government, Philippine folk dancing (phys. ed.), sociology, Spanish I, and José Riyal (the life and writings of their national hero). Nancy realized there is more emphasis on memorization in the Philippine classroom situations. "Students do not question their teachers and their ideas as we do here. Education is extremely important. It offers a chance to get ahead in a country in which very few have that chance. I knew one boy who had not enough money to purchase a textbook. He borrowed one and copied it page by page so he could keep up."

New exchange student Irmtraut Lang, better known as "Trish", joined Nancy Coble and her family for second semester this year. Trish comes from Schwalbisch Hall, West Germany.

Dramatics, Speech, Arts Develop Poise And Style . . .

Mrs. Celia C. Halford
Univ. of S.C., A.B.;
Univ. of Georgia, M.F.A.

In dramatics classes stage sets and greasepaint enliven a study of theater history highlighted by works of Shakespeare, Moliere, and Sophocles. Impromptu monologues encourage confidence, and through expression of individual style, students sample all aspects of theater production from set designing to makeup and publicity. The Triangle Theater attracts drama enthusiasts who gain experience in acting and in backstage management. The cluttered confusion and tense excitement of stage productions became a reality for students participating in the Thespian Players' memorable production of He Ain't Done Right By Nell. The old-fashioned melodrama tested the ingenuity of student set designers and stage hands while challenging the flair of individual talents as the flat characters came alive on stage.

There is probably only one class in Durham High where one finds students learning how to breathe, controlling knocking knees, making faces in unison, and being encouraged in verbosity. They study propaganda, learn parliamentary procedures and discussion techniques, and threaten furious revenge during debates. Topics on which speeches are given are of a surrealistic variety: "The World from a Honda", "Go Away, L.B.J.", "Is Man Basically Good?" and "How Not to Give a Speech". But out of the "sound and fury, signifying nothing", emerge speakers with confidence in their own ability to perform before an audience.

Library Adds Microfilm Reader Printer . . .

Mrs Willie G. Boone

Mrs. Mary S. Webster
East Carolina, B.S.

The Library-Audiovisual Department has a two-fold purpose: to teach and promote efficient library usage and reference skills, and to instruct and supervise library-audiovisual assistants in regular library routines. Sophomore orientation classes are a unique feature. During the opening month of school all sophomores receive intensive instruction from the librarians. Study guides provided each student during this time are useful throughout their high school careers.

In 1960 the audiovisual section was added to the library. Instruction in the operation of all types of equipment and preparation of visual aids is made available to the staff. Trained student projectionists perform a valuable service in assistance of audiovisual teaching routines. Lights and sound for programs and assemblies in the gym and auditorium are a major function of the assistants. Mrs. Willie G. Boone and Mrs. Mary S. Webster instructed seniors in operating micro-film reader printers. This new feature in the library enables maximum conservation and utilization of space. The librarians plan to make available to students reprints from this machine of information and magazine articles stores on the micro-film.

Mrs. Willie G. Boone, head librarian, is the Executive Secretary for the North Carolina High School Library Association. DHS library assistants have been outstanding in this organization since its beginning in 1947. They have offered two state presidents, one state treasurer, and seven district presidents to the organization.

Students learn to use motor vehicles safely and efficiently through both classroom and practical driving instruction. Classroom instruction deals with driver attitudes and physical characteristics, rules of the road, good pedestrian practices, and auto maintenance. Practicing driving includes teacher demonstrations and student practice in starting, steering, shifting gears, making turns, stopping, backing, and parking. Judgment acquired through course experiences afford the beginner an assurance of his driving ability.

Vocational Courses Teach Technical

The Vocational Department focuses upon preparing the student for a career applying technical skills. Success is largely dependent on an understanding of the laws of science and technology as applied to modern design, production, distribution, and service. While many vocational students go directly into full-time employment from high school, other further their education in the technical institutes, junior colleges, and universities.

Trade and Industrial Education offers classroom instruction and practical shop experience in Carpentry, Electronics, Auto Mechanics, Drafting, and Machine Shop. Industrial Cooperative Training, Distributive Education, and Cooperative Office Organizations are elective educational programs in which Durham's businesses, industries, and city schools work together to prepare students for their chosen occupation. Students participate in practical class instruction and maintain a schedule of part-time employment or on-the-job training during school hours.

The Department of Mathematics provides maximum flexibility in meeting student needs. Mathematics II develops an understanding of basic concepts applicable in technical courses. Contemporary courses in Algebra I and II and geometry explore the more abstract ideas of mathematics. Advanced courses in trigonometry, Algebra III, calculus, solid geometry, and advanced mathematics expand mathematical concepts in providing a foundation for students planning advanced college study.

Units of instruction in home economics are designed to meet the home and family life needs of students. The program provides practical learning to develop the student's ability to carry her respective home responsibilities. She receives instructon in relation to food, shelter, clothing, child care, health, home care of the sick, and family relationships. In addition to homemaking skills, there is emphasis on ideals needed for a desirable home in a democratic society. School experiences in home economics are correlated with the home and community life of students to achieve greater harmony between education and life.

The contemporary social, political, and economic problems of the world may be questioned in the perspective of history. The lessons of the past are applied to the problems of the present and to the future through the study of World and U. S. History. Geography, Economics, Sociology, and Government give the student an appreciation of the American heritage and the democratic way of life.

Profiles in Courage and The Age of Jackson are analyzed in a U. S. history class. A paper is required each grading period in which a student may express his own personal interpretations of the material studied. A course in t.v. history serves as a supplement to the text. In a sociology class, students investigate the organizations and institutions of society and man's behavior in it. The monetary situation of the country is discussed in economics. A geography class stresses the science of the earth and its life. A government student prepares himself to be a conscientious American citizen.

The DHS Art Department offers creative art survey courses on the sophomore, junior, and senior levels. Art IV encourages talented students to explore stitchery, oils, clay and polymer paints. Survey courses introduce diversified art media and theoretical concepts of line, color and perspective drawing. Studio work is accompanied by an introduction of art history and famous works of art. This year an introductory course in hand-wrought silver jewelry created interest among students who carried their investigation of technique and design into this new area. Instructors work closely with students on all course levels to stimulate individual creative expression.

In the 1967 Scholastic Art Competition DHS was recognized with fifteen gold key winners and eleven certificates of honor in art and photography divisions. Senior Thom Rogers took top honor with a semi-finalist Hallmark Hall of Fame award. Other winners were Sarah Peach, one gold key; Carol Jones, one gold key; Thom Rogers, two gold keys; Flavis Vazquez, two certificates; Janet Martell, three gold keys; Libby Knott, one certificate; Vickie Luquire, one gold key; Dale Mathews, one gold key; Shelia Hunt, one certificate; Daria Witt, two gold keys; Ruth Evans, one certificate; and Alexander Koplowitz, four certificates.
